

The four photographs your business needs

Most small businesses have no usable photographs, and take the wrong four when asked. These are the ones that do work — on a website, a listing, a card or a quote. A phone is fine.

The front, from across the street

Whole building or vehicle in frame, straight on, nothing cut off.

This is the one people match against when they arrive. It matters more than any other.

The work, finished and clean

One completed job, well lit, taken after cleanup rather than during.

For a trade this is the whole argument. Words cannot do it.

The people, doing something

Two or three of you working, not lined up against a wall.

A posed team photo reads as stock. A photo of somebody mid-job reads as real.

The detail that is yours

The pie case, the sign somebody's grandfather painted, the tool nobody else has.

This is the one that stops a stranger scrolling.

And how to take them

Outside, mid-morning or late afternoon, never midday sun. Clean the lens on your shirt first — it is the single biggest improvement available. Hold the phone still for a second after you tap. Landscape, not portrait. Take ten of each and keep one.

No photographs at all? That is common and it is not a problem. NESO makes original artwork for websites where a client has none, so nobody has to apologise for a phone camera.
